At a meeting of the Council of the Borough of Cambridge holden at the Guildhall this first day of January in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and one it was resolved unanimously on the proposition of the Mayor seconded by Mr Alderman Deck "That this Council do hereby, in pursuance of the Honorary Freedom of Boroughs Act, 1885, confer upon FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND, M.A., LL.D., D.C.L., Downing Professor of the Laws of England, the Honorary Freedom of the Borough of Cambridge, in recognition of the care and great ability which he has devoted to the investigation and the illustration of the early annals of this ancient Borough, and of his generosity in placing his erudition at the service of the Council by undertaking gratuitously the editing of the Charters of the Borough, and do hereby admit the said FREDERIC WILLIAM MAITLAND to be an Honorary Freeman of the Borough of Cambridge accordingly."

INTRODUCTION

BY

F. W. MAITLAND.

THE good work of transcribing and translating the royal charters of the town of Cambridge was undertaken some years ago by the late Mr F. C. Wace, M.A., then Mayor of the Borough, and Mr J. E. L. Whitehead, M.A., the Town Clerk. After having been for a while in my hands, it has been brought to completion by Miss Bateson, Associate and Lecturer of Newnham College. Though more than one hand has laboured on this book, I hope that it will not be found unworthy of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society or of the Municipal Corporation which has generously sanctioned and forwarded the publication of these its ancient records.

Cambridge, when it compares itself with other towns, has no reason to be ashamed of its charters. All the kings and queens regnant of England from Henry I to Charles II are represented in the following pages, with the exception of Stephen, Richard I, Edward V, Richard III, and Henry VII, though Edward III and Mary Tudor will appear only in an appendix. The reader will be able to compare a curt writ of Henry I with the artificially contrived cadences that were fashionable in the chancery of Richard II and with the lengthy and wordy, pompous and yet very cautious clauses of the seventeenth century. And beneath all this he may see the growth of an English town.

But to see this he must look somewhat intently. It must be confessed that to a student of institutions the series of charters granted to a borough is apt to be a little disappointing, at least for a moment. He wishes to ask many questions that it will not answer. But, if that be so, it is because he has yet to learn that to answer those questions is not the proper function of the documents which the borough community obtains from the central power. He is interested in constitutions, and he sees in the Cambridge of 1833 (on the eve, that is, of the great Municipal Reformation) a constitution which, if decadent, is elaborate. He sees a mayor, four bailiffs, four councillors, twelve aldermen, four and twenty common councilmen, two treasurers, two coroners, a high steward, a recorder. He sees also a body, a small body, of burgesses. Moreover, he can discover how these various organs and officers of the borough are constituted, what are their duties and what their rights<sup>1</sup>. Then, knowing that these matters had not been fixed by any general law, knowing that the reforming Act of 1835 was the first Act of its kind, he perhaps hopes that as regards each town separately he may see a constitution imposed upon it or manufactured for it by its charters. If that be so, disappointment awaits him. He has yet to learn how autonomous, how self-constituting and self-organizing the borough community had been.

During the Middle Ages the function of the royal charter was not that of 'erecting a corporation' or regulating a corporation which already existed, but that of bestowing 'liberties and franchises' upon a body which, within large limits, was free to give itself a constitution and to alter that constitution from time to time. There were things that it could not do unless it obtained a privilege from the king. It could not, for example, institute coroners, for that would have disturbed the justiciary scheme of the shire of which the borough formed a part. It could not declare that its own officers should do that work of summoning, distraining and arresting which had theretofore been done, even within borough walls, by the sheriff. Nor could it take from the sheriff the power and duty of collecting those rents and tolls which were due to the king. It demanded from the king a certain amount of exemption and immunity. But, this having been acquired, it was very free to give itself a constitution, to develop a conciliar organ, one council or two councils, to define the modes in which burgherhood should be acquired, to adopt the ballot or the open vote, and generally to be as oligarchic or as democratic as it thought fit. And at least from the fourteenth century onwards a large use was made of this liberty. Elaborate constitutions were established and after a few years abolished, and some of our boroughs had revolutions enough to satisfy a South American republic.

It is not uncommonly supposed that this medieval autonomy came to an end in the age of the Tudors, or at all events in the age of the Stewarts; that charters were then granted to the boroughs which imposed rigid and oligarchic constitutions; and that such charters were the outcome of a definite policy on the part of the State. Only to a very small degree is this true of Cambridge. No charter proceeding from any Tudor did anything towards defining the constitution of the burghal community, and yet during the reign of Elizabeth that constitution was being frequently altered at important points by the activity of the burgesses in their Common Halls<sup>1</sup>. The charter of James I (1605) did a very little and that of Charles I (1632) did a little more towards introducing rigidity by drawing a few constitutional outlines, for an outline drawn by charter the burgesses could not destroy by by-law. But it is plain that these instruments were not thrust upon the town by the central power in the State. The charter of James I was obtained by the burgesses after a prolonged and bitter controversy with the University and at the cost of much money. No doubt, in 1685 we at length see royal interference which, however, could soon afterwards be pronounced unlawful and futile. To Charles II the Town had to surrender its power of electing its own officers. The famous suit against the City of London had placed all charters at the royal mercy, for hardly a borough in England could hope to satisfy the king's subservient judges that it had not misused and forfeited its liberties. Still even then, when the king had secured the main matter and had provided by his charter that for the future every borough officer should be 'amovable' by the King in Council, he was for the more part content with the constitution that Cambridge had been slowly developing. And, as we know, he failed. After the Revolution of 1688 the charter of 1685 was treated as void; the charter of 1632 was resumed; and, as will be evident to those who study its terms, it was very far from forcing upon Cambridge a constitution that was defined in detail. As a matter of fact, in 1786 a by-law made an important change in the manner in which the mayor was to be elected, and the validity of this change was upheld by the Court of King's Bench<sup>1</sup>.

It may also be worthy of observation, for at this point mistakes can be made, that to the very last—that is, until 1835—the constitution of the corporate body at Cambridge was thoroughly democratic. It is true that this body had become very small. In a town with more than twenty thousand inhabitants it consisted of less than two hundred men, and a considerable number of them lived elsewhere. But this, let us notice, was the result of the old community's autonomy. That community had been free, too free, to decide the terms upon which it would admit new members, and unfortunately in the eighteenth and perhaps in the seventeenth century that freedom had been misused for unworthy purposes. However, if we look at this little body, this body of burgesses, we see that it is thoroughly democratic. Despite the conciliar organs that it has evolved, despite the twelve aldermen and the four and twenty members of the common council, all the important affairs of the corporation are brought before a general assembly in which all the corporators, all the burgesses, have votes. Possibly it was because the burgensic body was so small that it preserved its democratic shape, but at any rate in Cambridge there never took place that transfer of power to a 'select body' of which we may read elsewhere. To the end the power of the corporation remained in a primary assembly of the burgesses<sup>1</sup>.

These brief remarks have been written for the purpose of suggesting to the reader the point of view from which the following documents should be examined. All that he might like to know he will not find in them ; but then the mere fact that the charters are not dictating a constitution is highly important. He will doubtless know where to look for other documents. Cambridge has been very fortunate. Few indeed are the towns of England that can boast so good a book of local history as Cooper's Annals. Here we can offer no more than a few words about the royal charters, about the instruments which define the borough's relation to the king ; and we will take them in their chronological order.

I. Undated Writ of Henry I. Of the first of the documents that are here printed we have not the original. It is a writ of Henry I (1100—1135), addressed to Hervey, Bishop of Ely (1109—1131), and attested by an unnamed Chancellor, by Miles of Gloucester, and by Richard Basset, whose names seem to point rather to the latter than to the former half of Henry's reign. A comparatively modern copy of it is found in the Corporation's 'Cross Book.' Apparently the burgesses produced the original before the King's Bench in the days of Richard II (p. 80), and they obtained a confirmation of it in 1548 from Edward VI (p. 76). The fact that it was not included in earlier confirmations will not seem to throw doubt upon its genuineness if its import is considered, since such benefits as it bestows upon the burgesses were of a kind that must in all probability have soon become obsolete or were much more explicitly secured by more modern documents. The brief sentence in it which gave occasion for its production in the time of Richard II and again in the time of Edward VI merely expresses the king's will that men who do wrong in the borough shall 'there do right': that is, shall be tried in Cambridge and not elsewhere. Later documents defined in a far more accurate manner the privilege of being sued at home. Indeed it may be doubted whether Henry I, when he issued this document, supposed that he was conferring a boon upon the townsfolk. The main object of the writ which he sent to the bishop of Ely, who seemingly was acting as the local justiciar, and to the barons of Cambridgeshire, was to make 'his borough of Cambridge' the one 'port' and emporium of the shire. No boat is to be charged or discharged at any hithe in the county except at the hithe of the borough, and the town is to be the one place at which toll is to be taken: we might say in modern terms that the only custom-house is to be there. It has commonly been supposed that the king went so far as to forbid that any carts (carete) should be laden except in the borough; but this seems hardly a possible command. The important word appears to be, not carete, but carece, and this might well stand for barges<sup>1</sup>. Indubitably if all traffic by water were thus banned to the hithes of the county town, that town would be a gainer. Still it was toll that the king wanted, and that toll would be paid to the king's officers for the king's use. It is only therefore by a stretch of words that we can give this remarkable writ a place among the borough's Charters of Liberties.

II. Undated Writ of Henry II. Our second document is a writ of Henry II (1154—1189) in which he declares that he has granted his town of Cambridge to the burgesses. Here again we have to rely upon a copy in the Cross Book and upon a confirmatory charter granted by Edward VI (p. 74); but we may also gather that the original of this writ was produced before the justices of Richard II (p. 80). Apparently it was then thought to be a writ not of Henry II but of Henry I, and the same opinion seems to have been prevalent in the time of Edward VI. In Richard II's day, so we are told, the burgesses exhibited an undated document which they ascribed to Henry I and which said just what is said by this writ of Henry II. A mistake about such a matter might easily be made in the fourteenth century when not every one remembered that Henry I was neither Duke of Aquitaine nor Count of Anjou. This error, however, seems to be the foundation of the belief, entertained by Mr Cooper, that a grant of the town was made to the burgesses by the first of the Henries though 'neither this grant, nor any copy or enrolment of it is now known to be extant<sup>2</sup>.' Such a grant made at so early a day would have given Cambridge a highly exceptional eminence among her sister boroughs and we are inclined to suppose that the burgesses of Richard II's time pardonably confused the Henries and so misled Mr Cooper.

In the year which ended at Michaelmas 1185 the burgesses of Cambridge rendered an account at the Exchequer of three hundred marks of silver and one mark of gold 'that they might have their town at farm and that the sheriff might not meddle therewith<sup>1</sup>.' This would seem to be the occasion of the writ or charter that lies before us. Miss Bateson has ascertained by an inspection of the Pipe Rolls that in the next year, that which ended at Michaelmas 1186, the burgesses began to account for the farm of the borough. The writ is tested by Roger Fitz Reinfrid 'apud Keueilli,' a place which is not Kenilworth, but Quevilly near Rouen<sup>2</sup>. The king was in Normandy from April 1185 to April 1186<sup>3</sup>.

The king grants the town to the burgesses who thenceforth are to answer at the Exchequer for the 'farm' or rent of the borough which has heretofore been paid by the sheriff. It would be impossible to state in a few words the precise legal effect of this transaction or to deal with all the questions that it raises. As the later history of our town amply shows, learned persons might hold different opinions as to the scope of the few rough words in which a king of the twelfth century spoke of one of his boroughs as a single thing which he could let to farm. Especially was there room for controversy over the question whether he had placed at the burgesses' disposal those bits of waste land which would sooner or later become valuable<sup>4</sup>. However, the main effect of the grant is that the bailiffs or other officers elected by the burgesses will collect those various royal dues which heretofore have been collected by the sheriff—the haw-gavel and land-gavel, that is, the small rents due to the king from houses in the town and arable strips in the fields, also the tolls of the market, the profits of the borough court and of the king's mill—and will thereout pay to the king that 'farm' or rent of the town which the sheriff has formerly paid as part of the 'farm' of his shire. There is a chance that the bailiffs may make a profit; but the main advantage that the townsfolk gain is the exclusion of the sheriff and his subordinates.

It will be observed that this grant of the borough by Henry II is not a grant in perpetuity. It is a grant of the borough in 'farm' but not in 'fee farm.' Probably the king regards it as revocable, though the burgesses have been willing to give him a handsome sum for it.

III. First Charter of John (1201). To King John (1199—1215) Cambridge, like many other boroughs, owes her principal charters. The original of that which is dated on the 8th of January 1201 (p. 5) is not known to be extant, but a copy of it stands upon the Charter Roll at the Record Office. We may briefly set forth its contents.

The king grants to the burgesses of Cambridge a gild merchant and declares that all the burgesses of Cambridge of the gild merchant shall be quit of toll and similar dues (passage, lastage, pontage and stallage) in all his lands on both sides of the sea. It seems, however, to be extremely doubtful whether at Cambridge—and the same might be said of some other towns of equal rank—any gild merchant took definite shape and stood apart from the general body of burgesses. Apparently the freedom from toll which King John conceded was conceived to belong to every burgess of Cambridge merely because he was a burgess<sup>1</sup>: in other words, no trace seems as yet to have been found in later documents of any smaller body organized as a gild of merchants which was treated as having an exclusive right to that liberty which had been obtained from the king. It would appear, however, that the mayor and bailiffs, besides holding a court five times a year for suits concerning land, and besides holding a court every Tuesday for personal actions, were prepared to hold 'from day to day and from hour to hour their court of the gild merchant,' to decide disputes between merchant and merchant 'according to the exigence of the complaint.' This we are told in Richard II's day (p. 84). Thus we have a little evidence of a court which did summary justice between merchant and merchant and compelled the defendant to answer so soon as a charge was made against him; but we do not know that the organization of this court differed in any respect from that of the ordinary borough court. Also we have from the Tudor time a little evidence of an attempt to constitute or reconstitute a gild merchant, of which, however, all burgesses were to be members<sup>1</sup>. This occurs in 1547 exactly at a time when the burgesses were engaged in procuring a confirmation of their most ancient charters, and the suggestion seems allowable that their attention was directed by their legal advisers to the fact that the liberties granted by King John were granted to the burgesses of Cambridge 'of the gild merchant' and to none others<sup>2</sup>. More of the gild merchant cannot here be said; but John's time was the time when many of the boroughs were busy obtaining charters, when 'common forms' of charter were taking shape in the royal Chancery, and when a gild of merchants really was active and even dominant in some boroughs<sup>3</sup>.

We may too easily draw the inference that the organization of a town exactly follows the lines which seem to be drawn by its charter. As to the exemption from toll, this was a precious boon worthy of purchase by a good round sum, for the land was full of toll takers. Even until 1835 it was valued by Cambridge burgesses if they dealt in corn, and some of the inhabitants of Cambridge complained of the rules which debarred them from becoming members of the shrunken body which enjoyed this liberty.

Then we see jurisdictional privileges which once were highly prized. The burgesses are not to be impleaded outside the walls of the borough except in respect of 'exterior tenures': that is to say, lands which lie elsewhere. They may decline trial by battle, and instead may defend themselves in pleas of the crown according to the ancient custom of the borough, which probably required an oath sworn with oath-helpers. Their amercements are to be no heavier than such as are sanctioned by the old law of the borough. Again, in suits touching land the ancient custom is to be observed. They are encouraged to make reprisals if the officers of other towns take toll from one who belongs to the gild merchant of Cambridge.

Then their fair in Rogation week—Reach fair—is secured to them. How they had become entitled to a fair held so far outside their town we are not told. They are to be freed from any geares-gifu, any year's gift or annual present which the sheriff may have been exacting: such exactions were common and were often called the sheriff's aid or sheriff's welcome. They need not attend those scot-ales which a sheriff is wont to hold: those feasts at which he sells his beer while no one else may sell any.

There follows a general concession of ancient liberties, a declaration that any new customs established in time of war shall be quashed, a grant of royal protection to all traders who visit Cambridge, and a threat that those who trouble the burgesses will incur the penalty, the heavy penalty, of ten pounds.

On the whole this charter secured to Cambridge most of those 'franchises' which the chief boroughs of England enjoyed at the opening of the thirteenth century. Cambridge now starts upon its long career as a royally chartered town.

IV. Second Charter of John (1207). In 1207 a final settlement was made of the farm of the borough. The burgesses were to hold the town not only in farm but in fee-farm. They and their heirs were to hold it for ever at a rent of forty pounds of blanced money and twenty pounds of the current coin<sup>1</sup>.

To this was added a short clause which said that the burgesses might make of themselves a reeve (prepositum) whom they would and when they would. Apparently the borough had up to this time had four bailiffs as its principal officers. It now, following what has become the general fashion, desires to have some one officer at its head. For a short while this officer may have been called the reeve or the alderman; but very soon, and perhaps even in John's reign, the title of mayor, which was rapidly spreading outwards from London, was adopted, and Hervey the son of Eustace the son of Duning appears as mayor of Cambridge<sup>2</sup>.

V and VI. First and Second Charters of Henry III (1227). In 1227 when Henry III (1216—1272) had attained full age the burgesses obtained from him a confirmation of those liberties which his father had granted to them. The two charters of 1227 are copies of John's two charters.

VII. Third Charter of Henry III (1256). In 1256 the burgesses went to the king for what may seem to us a strange concession. In the Middle Ages the town-community to which a trader belonged was often conceived to be under a certain liability for his debts. A man of Cambridge will perhaps be arrested in the borough of Huntingdon because some other man of Cambridge owes money to a man of Huntingdon. About the middle of the thirteenth century a good many boroughs were endeavouring to obtain exemption from this rule. It will be seen that King Henry III did not grant an absolute exemption to the townsfolk of Cambridge. The man of Cambridge and his goods are to be free from arrest for the debt owed by another unless that other is solvent and the Cambridge burgesses in their court have made default in justice: so if the Cambridge court has 'denied right' to a man of Huntingdon it will still be imprudent for any man of Cambridge to visit the neighbouring town. Not until 1275 was an end put to this system of intermunicipal reprisals<sup>1</sup>, and long after that the old principle was still enforced against foreigners.

VIII. Fourth Charter of Henry III (1256). On the same occasion, but by another charter, some new and important privileges were acquired by the burgesses. First they were to have the highly valued 'return of writs.' Up to this time, though they had a court of their own in which the sheriff did not preside and though he no longer collected those revenues that had been granted in farm to the burgesses, he still had much to do in the borough. It was for him to execute all the processes of the king's own courts, the Chancery, Exchequer and Bench, and to do all the summoning, distraining and arresting that royal writs commanded. The townsfolk desired to get this work into their own hands so that it might be done by their elected officers. When they have the 'return of writs' the sheriff will still be the person who will be directed by the king's courts to make the requisite summonses, distraints, arrests and so forth; but he will be bound to hand on the writs to the town officers who will execute them. If those officers make default, then the sheriff may be told to disregard the franchise of the town (quod non omittas propter aliquam libertatem); still normally all this executive work will be done by the town's own officers. This is a privilege which many boroughs were seeking in the reign of Henry III. At a later time a few took a further step along the same road, and, being made 'counties of themselves,' had sheriffs of their own who were the direct recipients of the writs that flowed from Westminster.

Another right that was granted to the Cambridge burgesses in 1256 was that of entertaining in their court the action which was called in Latin de retito namii and in French vee de nam. We know it as the action of replevin. It had been treated as an action which did not fall within the ordinary competence of the communal and seignorial courts, for the distrainor who refused to surrender the distrained goods when security was tendered to him for the prosecution of the claimant's suit was regarded as committing a serious offence against the king.

Thirdly, the townsfolk were to have the right of electing coroners. To be free from the interference of the officers of the shire was the object at which they had been aiming, and by the end of Henry III's reign their exemption was almost complete.

IX. Charter of Edward I (1280). From Edward I (1272—1307) they sought no more than a confirmation of previous charters. In his reign a confirming charter takes the form that is known as an Inspeximus. The king says 'We have inspected' such and such charters of our ancestors and we now confirm them: the contents of the documents that are to be confirmed are recited at full length.

X. Charter of Edward II (1313). From Edward II (1307—1327) we have a charter granted in 1313. He confirmed charters of his father and grandfather, and the confirmation was followed by a clause which had become usual and which declared that the burgesses were to enjoy the chartered liberties although of such liberties they had made no use in the past. This was a protection against the legal doctrine that franchises are forfeited as well by non-use as by misuse or abuse. A few new privileges were then conceded. The burgesses were to be free from pavage, murage and pickage throughout the king's dominions. Apparently therefore a Cambridge man who went into another town might not only refuse to pay toll and other dues of a similar kind, but could not be compelled to contribute to the paving of the streets or the maintenance of the wall of the town to which he had gone<sup>1</sup>. The right of the burgess to plead and be impleaded only within the borough was declared and defined. The jury which convicts him is to consist of his fellow-townsmen unless either the king or the community of the borough is concerned in the cause. The burgesses may bequeath lands and tenements within the borough as though they were chattels. It is not improbable that long before this in Cambridge, as in other boroughs, the right to give lands by last will had been assumed and was already regarded as sanctioned by custom.

XI. Letters Patent of Richard II (1377). The long

reign of Edward III (1327—1377) is unrepresented. We may suppose that by this time the men of Cambridge had acquired all the privileges that they needed from the king and were busily engaged at home in developing their institutions within those wide limits that were set by the law of the land and by the not illiberal immunities that their ancestors had purchased. On the other hand, from Richard II's time (1377—1399) come some highly important documents. However, the letters patent which were obtained in 1377 at the very beginning of the reign were a mere confirmation of Edward's II's charter. We say 'letters patent' for, though it is common to speak of all or nearly all the instruments which the kings grant to the towns as 'borough charters,' still there are formal differences between the solemn carta and the less solemn litterae patentes, and, as usually happens in such cases, the less solemn form gradually prevailed over the more solemn. The reader who is careful of such matters may contrast the long and sometimes very interesting lists of witnesses who attest the execution of a true carta with the curt Teste meipso which the English king thinks a sufficient authentication of his open letters.

XII. First Charter of Richard II (1382). We come to a document which records not an increase but a diminution of those liberties that the community had enjoyed. The story of the Peasants' Revolt in 1381 cannot be told here; but in consequence of the riots in Cambridge the borough was adjudged to have forfeited its franchises. The effect of such a forfeiture would be not only that the burgesses would lose the precious immunity from toll and other like privileges that had been granted to them, but also that some warden appointed by the king would take the place of their elected mayor and that their farming of the town would come to an end. However, after they had made humble submission, a less extreme punishment was imposed. Their rent was raised from 101 to 105 marks (in other words from £67. 6s. 8d. to £70), and at the same time a certain portion of their liberties was taken from them and bestowed upon the University. This portion consisted of the guardianship of the assizes of bread, wine and beer, the guardianship of the assay and supervision of weights and measures, the jurisdiction over regraters and forestallers, and the jurisdiction over sellers of unwholesome victuals. Jurisdiction was a source of revenue, and the result of this change would be that a considerable number of fines and amercements which otherwise would have been paid to the mayor and bailiffs of the borough would flow into the coffers of the University. On these unfavourable terms the liberties of the Town were restored to the body which we may by this time call the corporation of the borough: its rent or 'farm' was increased and its income was diminished, probably by at least £10, for this was the sum which the University was annually to pay for the jurisdictional rights that it was acquiring<sup>1</sup>.

The task of reading a Latin charter of this age may perhaps be lightened if the reader knows that, following a fashion set by the papal chancery, the scribe of the charter is often aiming at the production of a certain rhythmical effect. He wishes to end as many clauses as possible with one or other of a few admired cadences. The nature of the favourite cadence may be illustrated by some of the instances that occur in the document which lies before us. Thus we have—graviter impetiti—notorie redundabant—forisfacere non deberent—humillime submisissent—integre seisienda. It is as though a man writing in English were to strain after such ends for his sentences as—'university jurisdiction'—'liberal education'—'all of his faithful lieges'—'to the contrary notwithstanding.' It is chiefly in the preambles or narrative parts of documents that this fine writing is found. When the operative part is reached the clerk must attend to business and think less of his style.

XIII. Second Charter of Richard II (1385). In 1385 the borough corporation was able, not indeed to recover what it had lost in 1382—for that had been given to the University—but to acquire from the king some new sources of profit. It complained of a diminished income. Not only had the burgesses lost what the masters and scholars had gained, but many burgage houses whence rents (haw-gafol or 'high gable rents') were payable had perished in a recent fire. So the community procured a grant of 'fines, ransoms, amercements and forfeited issues.' These, it will be understood, were not the profits of the borough court. Such profits already formed part of that 'town' which the burgesses held in farm. What they newly acquired in 1385 consisted of pecuniary penalties imposed by the king's own courts, by the King's Bench, the Common Bench, the Exchequer, justices in eyre, justices of assize and gaol delivery, justices of the peace, the steward and marshals of the king's household. Thenceforward if an inhabitant of Cambridge were fined in the King's Bench, the corporation of the town would be able to procure the amount of the fine after it had been paid into the Exchequer. And so with 'forfeited issues.' If in an action in the king's courts a sheriff is commanded to distrain a man of Cambridge in order to compel his appearance, and the sheriff seizes corn or other 'issues' of that man's land, and, owing to continued contumacy, those issues are forfeited, the profit is to come ultimately to the hands of the officers of the town of Cambridge. In addition to this 'the chattels of fugitives, felons and outlaws' were granted to the municipal corporation. Even at the present day a municipal corporation will occasionally be able to make a little profit out of such clauses as those which are contained in the present charter. Very recently the corporation of Nottingham succeeded in obtaining from the Treasury the proceeds of certain fines that had been imposed upon offenders at Nottingham<sup>1</sup>. In days when felons and outlaws still forfeited their chattels, the revenue of a borough was sometimes materially increased by a lucky windfall.

XIV. Letters Patent of Richard II (1394). The charter of 1385 contained a saving clause which excepted out of the grant that was made to the Town 'fines, ransoms, amercements and forfeited issues in cases in which scholars of the University or their servants were parties.' Apparently this gave rise to some difficulties when the burgesses went to the Exchequer to obtain the money to which the charter entitled them. In 1394 those difficulties were to be removed. A certificate from the officers of the University to the effect that a particular fine, amercement or the like did not fall within the exception was to be treated as conclusive at the Exchequer, and without further investigation the Treasurer and Barons were to allow to the burgesses the sum that was in question.

XV, XVI, XVII, XVIII. Letters Patent of Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI (1399—1461). From the three Lancastrian kings we have nothing but confirmations. Though the confirming documents fill a small space in this book, it should be understood that really they are long. Each Inspeximus takes up bodily into itself its immediate predecessor, so that a letter of Henry VI may recite the whole of a letter of Henry V, which may recite the whole of a letter of Henry IV, and so on back to the days of John. Only after reading charters which contain and confirm other charters do we at length reach the few words of confirmation which are being obtained from the reigning king.

XIX. Letters Patent of Edward IV (1465). This document of 6 July 1465 might be called an 'exemplification' of a 'private act of parliament' passed in the session which began on 29 April 1463. The corporation of Cambridge had then presented a petition. It stated that the town of Cambridge was bound annually to pay to the king the farm of £70, and had also to pay £8. 10s. to the Priory of Caldwell and £1 to the Priory of Kenilworth. It also stated that to every 'dysme and quinzime'—that is to every national tax which took the form of a 'tenth' on boroughs and a 'fifteenth' on counties—the inhabitants of Cambridge had to contribute £46. 12s. 2½d. It also stated that the corporate revenue did not exceed £40 yearly. It complained that many houses had been demolished in order to make room for King's College. It also alleged that Henry VI 'late King of this realm in deed and not by right' had by letters patent dated 18 July 1446 reduced the contribution of the town towards each dysme and quinzime to £20. It stated that this reduction was to be effectual although the community of Cambridge might—by their representatives in parliament, we suppose—be deemed consenters to the act that imposed the tax, and although that act contained a clause declaring that exempt places were not to be excepted. It then said that this deed of the usurping Lancastrian was void since the Yorkist had 'graciously taken upon him the crown.' It prayed that Henry's concession might be confirmed in parliament.

Then we learn that the petition thus presented in the parliament of 1463 received the royal assent which was endorsed upon it in the usual form: Soit fait come il est désiré. And now on 6 July 1465 the burgesses obtain an 'exemplification' of this act: in other words a solemnly authenticated copy of the petition and endorsement, which copy they will be able to produce if any attempt be made to exact more than £20 from the inhabitants of Cambridge.

XX and XXI. Letters Patent of Edward IV (1466) and of Henry VIII (1510). These are mere confirmations.

XXII. Letters Exemplificatory of Henry VIII (1530). What is 'exemplified' by this instrument is an extract from the rolls of the court of King's Bench showing how in a then recent case the municipal corporation of Cambridge had asserted and proved its chartered right to the chattels of felons. The extract begins with the record of an inquest held by the two coroners of the borough which tells how Robert Ashwell was slain in Trumpington Street by James Newland, how the murderer fled, and how he had within the liberty of the town of Cambridge goods to the value of twenty marks, which were seized by the mayor and bailiffs. Then we learn that, the indictment having been removed into the King's Bench, the mayor and bailiffs were summoned. They appeared by their attorney, who said on their behalf that they did not understand that the king required an answer from them. This, it may be noted, was the proper and civil phrase for a defendant to use, when he was in effect going to plead that the king was making a baseless claim. Upon this follows a highly interesting plea, which begins with the assertion that Cambridge is a corporate borough by prescription. We may observe that by the time of Henry VIII English lawyers had adopted the notion that a corporation is no natural growth but must have been created by public power. They were, however, willing to admit that corporateness, like other liberties and franchises, could be prescribed for, and, there being no charter which had explicitly created a corporation at Cambridge, the attorney for the borough relied upon prescription. Then he produced the charter of Richard II (No. XIII) which conferred the right to the chattels of felons, fugitives and outlaws. Then he produced the last of the confirming documents, namely, the letters patent granted by Henry VIII (No. XXI) who was the then reigning king. Then he asserted that the goods of the murderer had been lawfully seized by the mayor and bailiffs, and he ended his plea with the proper offer of verification. To that plea the Attorney-General demurred. And then there was a joinder in demurrer: that is to say, both parties desired the judgment of the court on the question whether the plea was sufficient in law. Upon this follows a judgment for the Town. The mayor and bailiffs may keep the goods of the murderer and 'may go hence without day': in other words, they are dismissed out of the court without being told that they must appear again. A saving clause for 'the kings right if any' is a common form in such cases. The king is not to be debarred from reasserting his right, if any, upon some future occasion.

From the fact that the Attorney-General demurred we may perhaps infer that the case was treated as being doubtful and important. New ideas about the nature and origin of corporations were making their way into English law, and it may not have been plain that the corporate quality could be claimed on the ground of prescription.

It will be observed that this exemplification does not bear the Teste meipso which would stand on letters patent issuing from the Chancery, but was attested by John Fitzjames who was Chief Justice of England. Also the seal seems to be, not the great seal of the realm, but that of the court of King's Bench. An exemplification of a record of a court of law could probably be obtained, not as a favour, but on payment of a fee to the clerk of the court. It was useful to have an authenticated copy of the record of a suit in which the borough had been victorious.

XXIII. Letters Patent of Edward VI (1548). A confirmation was obtained from Edward VI of his father's letters

(XXI) which confirmed a long series of earlier instruments. But also for some reason or another the burgesses obtained a confirmation of their two oldest documents, the writs of Henry I and Henry II, and these seem never to have been confirmed before this time. One of them was more and the other but little less than four centuries old.

XXIV. Letters Exemplificatory of Edward VI (1548). What are here exemplified are two successful claims of cognizance made in the reign of Richard II, the one in the court of King's Bench, and the other in the court of the King's Household. The rulers of the borough in 1548 must have desired to have in their hands an indisputable proof that in Richard II's days the exclusive right of the borough court to entertain actions arising within the limits of the borough was proved before two high tribunals.

The extract from the rolls of the King's Bench (p. 79) records an action for assault and false imprisonment brought in Richard II's reign by John Longe against William Burton. Thereupon the attorney of the borough appears to claim cognizance of the suit for the borough court (p. 81). A long and interesting assertion follows. It tells us what the men of Cambridge at the end of the fourteenth century thought of the ancient history of the borough and incidentally it throws light upon the courts that they were holding. Their attorney produced the writs of Henry I and Henry II. Apparently that which came from Henry II he ascribed to Henry I (p. 81), but he also seems to have had some confirmatory charter of Henry II, of which we have seen no other trace. Then he showed John's charter. Then he told of the courts that were held: a court held on five stated days in the year for actions touching lands: a court held once a week for personal actions: a court which could be held from day to day if strangers were concerned: a court of the gild merchant which would do justice between merchants not only from day to day, but from hour to hour : two courts-leet with view of frankpledge held in spring and autumn (p. 85). Then the charters of Henry III, Edward II and Richard II were tendered. Then four cases from the reigns of the then reigning king (Richard II) and of Edward III in which cognizance had been granted to the borough court were alleged and the records of the King's Bench were cited (p. 89). Finally a writ or 'letter close' to the justices which had just been obtained was produced : in effect it told the justices to allow the claim of the burgesses. And allowed it was by the usual words 'Therefore let them have their liberty.' Whereupon the attorney of the Borough, as in duty bound, appointed a day for the litigation in the gildhall, and the litigants were told that, if full and speedy justice were not done to them, they might return to the King's Bench.

The second record that was exemplified in 1548 came from the court of the King's Household of Richard II's day (p. 93). That court being at Cambridge, Thomas Lodeworth had sued Geoffrey Castur in it for a debt : but the attorney of the Town had claimed cognizance of the cause and claimed it successfully.

XXV. Letters Patent of Elizabeth (1589). Not until 1589 did the incorporated burgesses of Cambridge obtain a secure lordship of Sturbridge Fair, that great fair, 'by far the largest and most famous fair in all England,' which was held in the fields of Cambridge. Seemingly their title was of this sort : A fair had been granted by John to the Lepers' Hospital which stood in the remotest corner of the territory of Cambridge where its chapel may be seen to this day. But that hospital had been founded and endowed by the community of the town and the community claimed to be its patron. Then we may suppose that, as leprosy became much rarer than it had been in the twelfth century, and the hospital was not required, the burgesses began to regard themselves as entitled to the profits of the fair<sup>1</sup>. It may well be doubted whether to medieval lawyers such a claim on their part would have seemed unreasonable. Elizabeth's charter tells us how Henry VIII attacked their title by an information of quo warranto, how they submitted themselves, and how the fair was adjudged to the king<sup>2</sup> (p. 99). Probably their right to the fair was by no means clear, but we cannot argue that they knew that they were in the wrong merely because they declined to plead against King Henry VIII in the fulness of his power. From his daughter they obtained the statement that the fair had been theirs from time immemorial (p. 97) and a grant which would set the question at rest for all time to come. That grant, however, was not obtained until after a prolonged struggle with the University, in the course of which the clauses of the draft charter, or 'book' as it was called, underwent careful criticism and many alterations. We find that the Town had retained the Attorney-General and the University had retained the Solicitor-General. The University was in the act of obtaining letters patent which would secure to her certain jurisdictional rights in the fair. The grant to the Town was dated on the 15th of August, the grant to the University on the 30th. The relation that the two documents were to bear to each other required nice adjustment. The townsfolk were not satisfied by the result and accused their mayor of having betrayed their interests. The University, it will be remembered, had ever since the insurrection of Richard II's time been possessed of that jurisdiction over victuals, weights and measures which the Town had forfeited, and the exercise of jurisdictional rights in Sturbridge Fair had been the occasion of many disputes.

<sup>1</sup> See the History of Sturbridge Fair in vol. v. of Biblioth. Topograph. Britan. I think this the most probable account of the matter but am not aware that it has ever been satisfactorily explained.

XXVI. Letters Patent of James I (1605). Until 1605 the municipal corporation had never been formally 'created' by the king. Already in Henry VIII's reign it had successfully asserted its prescriptive right to be corporate. But in the reign of James I the time had come when it was hardly safe for a body to live without a solemn document wherein the king professedly made it 'a body corporate and politic in deed, fact and name.' Old charters which spoke now of the 'men' and now of the 'burgesses' of the town, now of the mayor and now of the mayor and bailiffs, were apt to occasion difficulty. The greater part of the long and wordy document which was obtained from King James is taken up by the formal creation and erection of a corporation (p. 119), which is to be capable of holding property, of suing and being sued (p. 121), of using a common seal (p. 123), of making by-laws (p. 123), and of acquiring in mortmain lands to the value of £60 a year (p. 127). Then to this corporation are confirmed the rights granted by the king's predecessors, the old rent being still reserved (p. 129). The length and verbosity of the charters of the Stewarts, which are well illustrated by this document and the documents that follow it, are in a great measure due to the extreme severity of the rules of construction which the courts of law had been applying to royal grants. Everything was to be presumed in favour of the kingly grantor. The words by which he purported to confer a right were to mean as little as was possible. The result of this was that the grantees were studious to obtain, and willing to pay for, more and more words. For example, the clause which tells how the king makes the grant 'of our special grace, from our certain knowledge and mere motion' was worth obtaining. It would sometimes, though not always, serve to repel the objection that the king had been 'deceived in his grant' or must not be supposed to have really intended all that he had apparently said.

It will be noticed that even James I did very little in the way of imposing a constitution upon the borough. He established no council to rule the borough. The power to make by-laws was to be exercised by the whole body of the burgesses or the greater part of them, but the mayor was to have a veto (p. 123).

XXVII. Letters Patent of Charles I (1632). Except during a brief interval (1685—8) this instrument continued to be for upwards of two centuries 'the governing charter' of the borough. It was so until 1835 when the municipal corporations were reformed. It is a very long document and at first sight may seem to have done far more than really it did. It once more incorporates what was already a corporation both by prescription and the charter of James I (p. 139), and the full flood of words which bestowed capacity to sue and be sued, to hold property, to use a common seal and to make by-laws was let loose once more. It declares that there are to be twelve aldermen and twenty-four members of the common council (p. 143), and in so doing it confers from without a little new rigidity upon the constitution which had been evolved from within. But as to the function of these conciliar bodies it refers to the ancient usage, and nothing was said about qualification, mode of election or tenure of office. Nothing, again, was said about the definition of the general body of burgesses, about the right to burgherhood or the means by which this body might perpetuate itself. We notice also that the power of making by-laws, which is given in large terms, was reposed in this general body assembled in a primary assembly.

The really important clauses of the charter seem to be the following. In the first place much was said of the two treasurers. Apparently it was to be made quite clear that the treasurers were to be able to sue in the borough court for money penalties incurred by infringers of the by-laws (p. 145).

There had been difficulties about this matter. It might be argued that in such a case one and the same person, one and the same corporation, was both plaintiff and judge, besides being the law-maker and the recipient and enjoyer of the exacted money. We may conjecture that all objections on this score were for the future to be carefully precluded. Secondly, it was to be plain that the mayor or a bailiff might appoint a deputy (p. 151). Thirdly, with some exceptions, no one was to exercise in the borough any craft or manual occupation unless he had served for seven years as an apprentice (p. 157). Fourthly,—and perhaps in this clause we may see what the corporation regarded as the main point of the charter—the corporation is to have a very general power of taxing, not merely its own members, but the other inhabitants of the borough (p. 159). Were we to ask whether the king himself had power to lay taxes on his subjects or could give any such power to others, we should ask a question about which in 1632 King Charles and many of his subjects held diametrically opposite opinions. We know how it was finally decided, and that a famous burgess of Cambridge, Oliver Cromwell, took part in the decision.

Then there was a confirmation of ancient liberties (p. 161). The rights of the University were carefully saved (p. 165), and there were elaborate dispensing clauses such as the kings loved and in which they posed as sovereigns who were competent to override both statute and common law (pp. 165—7)<sup>1</sup>.

XXVIII. Letters Patent of Charles II (1685). On 11 November 1684 the Corporation executed a deed which purported to surrender to the king the right of appointing the mayor, aldermen, common councilmen, bailiffs and other officers of the borough. A few weeks afterwards, on 3 January 1685, the present document was sealed. By it the king filled the offices with his nominees, who, however, with some few exceptions, seem to have been the men who were in office at the time of the surrender<sup>1</sup>. The chief point secured by the king in the new charter was that for the future the King in Council would have an absolutely unfettered power of removing all or any of the holders of office, so that all the rulers of the borough would have good reason for dreading his displeasure. Repeated in town after town, this assumption of control over the municipalities would, it need hardly be said, make the king master of parliament. For the rest, we see less change in the constitution of Cambridge than we might have expected. The officers, including the aldermen and councillors, were to be appointed in the manner accustomed within the borough during the last twenty years. This provision would have had the effect of stereotyping some parts of the constitution which in the past had been treated as alterable. But the whole document became a nullity. The surrender of 1684 was never enrolled. At the last moment of his reign the terrified James endeavoured to retrace a few of his many false steps and by a Proclamation declared, in effect, that at Cambridge and other towns which were in a like case the surrendered charters were valid and the substituted charters void<sup>2</sup>. This was on 17 October 1688. On 5 November the deliverer landed.

<sup>1</sup> As to these dispensing clauses, which were by no means new under the Stewarts, see Hardy, Introduction to the Charter Rolls, pp. xxiv., xxv. The reader can there find an explanation of the reference made in the document that is before us (p. 165) to a statute of 18 Hen. VI.

At this point ends the history of the town of Cambridge, so far as it is written in royal charters. The next interference of national authority with municipal affairs was to be of a far different kind. In 1833 the corporation was called upon to render an account of its stewardship. In 1835 it was reformed.

Appendix I. In an Appendix are printed four documents which have been preserved along with the charters of liberties. Of these, the first shows us the civic corporation bound to pay to the Prior of Caldwell a rent of £8. 10s. This rent formed part of the 'third penny' of the borough to which the earl had been entitled<sup>1</sup>. The acquisition by the burgesses of the 'farm' of their town had, at least in some cases, involved not only a settlement with the king, but also a settlement with the earl, for he had been entitled to a third part ('the third penny') of the profits of the borough court.

Appendix II. In 1455 Henry VI grants to the burgesses a piece of land which he had acquired from the Prior of Anglesey, the burgesses having given in exchange another piece of land for the enlargement of the site of King's College. The whereabouts of these plots has been lately explained by the Registrary of the University in his noble History<sup>2</sup>.

Appendix III. The practice of giving to burgesses the right to take toll in their town and to be themselves quit of toll both there and elsewhere naturally gave rise to inter-municipal disputes. Sometimes the question whether the men of one town had lawfully become free of toll in another town involved a comparison between the dates of the charters granted to the two towns respectively, and an investigation of the state of affairs which had existed before the charters were sealed. We here see an Award made in 1519 by two arbitrators who are justices of the court of Common Pleas. The matter at stake is the toll demanded in Sturbridge Fair from burgesses of Northampton. An annuity of ten shillings is to be paid by the corporation of Northampton to that of Cambridge, and there is to be a further payment of two pence for

Appendix IV. Our last document shows us Philip and Mary restoring to the corporation certain rents which upon the dissolution of the chantries in the reign of Edward VI had been seized on the part of that protestant king. These rents issuing out of booths in Sturbridge Fair and amounting to £8. 15s. 2d. had been bequeathed to the community by divers benefactors upon trusts which in the language of modern lawyers were partly superstitious and partly charitable. Edward had paid to the burgesses for distribution among the poor an annuity of £6. 10s. 6d., keeping to himself the residue which represented so much as had been devoted to the procurement of masses for the dead. His catholic successors restored the old rents to the corporation, to be held upon the old trusts, which were no longer—though they soon would be once more—unlawful. However, it will be seen that a reason is given for the invalidation of Edward's seizure of the rents, and that this reason has nothing to do with religion. It was said that these rents, since they issued out of customary lands, did not fall within the Act which gave the endowment of chantries to the king.

It is a mistake to suppose that the great Act of 1835 dissolved old corporations and put new corporations in their stead. The Corporation of the Borough of Cambridge whose Council has seen good to provide for the publication of these charters is the selfsame body to which the charters were granted. In 1835 it renewed its youth and at the beginning of another century can look forward to a vigorous life and backward upon a memorable history.

I. WRIT OF KING HENRY THE FIRST.

<sup>1</sup>Henry King of the English to Hervey Bishop of Ely and A.D. 1120
all his barons of Cambridgeshire greeting. I forbid that any —1131 boat shall ply at any hithe in Cambridgeshire, save at the hithe of my borough of Cambridge, nor shall barges be laden, save in the borough of Cambridge, nor shall any take toll elsewhere, but only there. And whosoever doth forfeit in the borough let him there do right. And if any do otherwise, I command that he be at right thereof before my justice
when I command that there be plea thereof. As witnesses:
the Chancellor and Miles of Gloucester and Richard Basset at London.

II. WRIT OF KING HENRY THE SECOND.

<sup>2</sup>Henry by the grace of God King of England and A.D. 1161
Duke of Normandy and Aquitaine and Count of Anjou, —1189 to his Justices, Sheriffs and all his Ministers and faithful People greeting. Know ye that I have delivered at farm to my burgesses of Cambridge my town of Cambridge to be holden of me in chief by the same farm which my sheriffs were wont to render to me, and so that they themselves [the burgesses] do answer therefor at my exchequer.
And therefore I command that ye guard and maintain the said burgesses and all things to them belonging as though they were mine own, so that no one may in any wise cause to

III. FIRST CHARTER OF KING JOHN.

<sup>1</sup>John by the grace of God, King of England etc. Know ye that we have granted and by this our present charter have confirmed to our burgesses of Cambridge a gild merchant, and that none of them shall plead without the walls of the borough of Cambridge concerning any plea, unless they be pleas of exterior tenures, except our moneyers and servants. Moreover we have granted to them that none of them shall make [proof by] battle, and that with regard to pleas pertaining to our crown they may deraign themselves according to the ancient custom of the borough. This also we have granted to them, that all the burgesses of Cambridge of the gild of merchants shall be quit of toll and passage and lastage and pontage and stallage, in fair and without, and throughout the ports of the sea of England and of all our lands on this side of the sea and beyond the sea, saving in all things the liberties of the city of London, and that none be adjudged to be in mercy as to his money except according to the ancient law of the borough which they had in the times of our ancestors. And that they may justly have their lands and pledges and all debts, whosoever may owe the same. And that right shall be done to them touching their lands and tenures which are within the borough according to the custom of the borough. And of all their debts which shall have been contracted at Cambridge and of the pledges made there, pleas shall be held at Cambridge. And if any in all our land shall take toll or customs from the men of Cambridge of the gild of merchants and shall have made default in right, then the sheriff of Cambridge or the reeve of Cambridge shall take therefor a distress at Cambridge, saving in all things the liberties of the city of London. or some of them, they nevertheless and their heirs and successors beforementioned may henceforth reasonably enjoy and use the liberties and quittances beforementioned and every of them without let or hindrance by us or our heirs or any of our ministers whomsoever. And moreover we have granted to them for ourselves and our heirs that they and their heirs and successors beforementioned shall be for ever free from pavage, murage and pickage within our realm and dominion. And that they may by last will bequeath their lands and tenements within the borough and the suburb thereof as if the same were their chattels to whatsoever persons or person they may wish, provided the same shall not come into mortmain. And that concerning trespasses or contracts made in the same borough and suburb they may not sue or be sued outside that borough unless the matter concerns us or our heirs. And that touching those trespasses and contracts or other internal affairs they shall not be convicted by strangers but only by their fellow-burgesses, unless the matter concerns us or our heirs or the commonalty of the aforesaid borough. But so nevertheless that by our grants abovementioned no manner of prejudice be done to the masters and scholars of the university of the same town in any of the liberties granted to them by our progenitors formerly Kings of England. As witnesses: the venerable fathers John Bishop of Norwich and John Bishop of Bath and Wells, Gilbert de Clare Earl of Gloucester and Hertford, Aymer de Valence Earl of Pembroke, Hugh le Despenser, Ralph Fitz William, Bartholomew of Badlesmere and others. Here follows a copy of the Charter granted by Edward II. in the 7th year of his reign and on the 27th of November 1313 hereinbefore translated and numbered X. The present instrument then proceeds as follows :—

Now we ratifying and according the said gifts, grants, confirmations, liberties and quittances aforesaid, do for ourselves and our heirs, so far as in us lies, accept, approve, ratify and by the tenour of these presents grant and confirm the same to the said burgesses and their heirs and successors in such wise as the aforesaid charter reasonably testifies, and as the said burgesses have always hitherto been wont reasonably to use and enjoy the aforesaid liberties and quittances from the time of the grant and making of the aforesaid charter. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. As witness myself at Westminster on the eighth day of December in the first year of our reign.

XII. FIRST CHARTER OF KING RICHARD THE SECOND.

<sup>1</sup>Richard by the grace of God King of England and France and Lord of Ireland to his Archbishops, Bishops, Abbots, Priors, Dukes, Earls, Barons, Knights, Justices, Sheriffs, Reeves, Bailiffs, Ministers and other faithful People greeting. Know ye that whereas the mayor, bailiffs and commonalty of our town of Cambridge were accused and gravely impeached before us in our last parliament, for that they of late wickedly revolted against us and our honour and their debt of allegiance, and in the time of the said insurrection were said to have wilfully committed divers notable and enormous defaults and excesses and very many wrongs, which, it was said, notoriously redounded not only to the disgrace and contempt of our royal majesty but also to the most grievous damage and loss of some of our faithful lieges : Whereas thereupon at the time of the said murder did belong to the aforesaid James, and which after the taking of the inquest aforesaid were found at and within the said town of Cambridge, at the time of the said murder perpetrated by the said James and afterwards, and in their hands they do retain and hold the same in aid of the aforesaid farm of the said town of Cambridge, as well they may. And this the said now mayor and bailiffs are ready to verify. And they pray judgement whether the now lord King, for the aforesaid goods and chattels which belonged to the aforesaid James Newland, will any further impeach them or will charge them with debt for the same goods and chattels. And the aforesaid Richard Lyster, the Attorney-General of the now lord King, who sues on the King's behalf, says for the King that the title of the said mayor and bailiffs by themselves above pleaded and made for maintaining them to have and retain the goods and chattels aforesaid, is not sufficient in law, and that thereto he on behalf of the said lord King has no need nor is bound by law to answer. And because of the insufficiency of the said plea and title, he prays judgement for the said lord King, and that they, for the goods and chattels, so seized by them as aforesaid, ought to answer to the said lord King, and that they ought to be adjudged to make fine with the said lord King on account of the seizing and retaining of the same. And the said mayor and bailiffs, for that they have pleaded and shewn a sufficient plea and title to maintain them the mayor and bailiffs in retaining and having the goods and chattels aforesaid, which they are prepared to verify as the court &c., and which the aforesaid Richard Lyster, who sues &c., has not denied (nor has he in any wise replied to the same but altogether refuses to admit the verification aforesaid), once more pray judgement, and that the said letter patent to them and their successors, be allowed &c. aforesaid King Henry the grandfather &c., the bailiffs of the aforesaid borough, for the time being, likewise held before them all pleas arising within the said borough and suburb in form aforesaid; And they and all their successors likewise, afterwards have held before them all the aforesaid pleas in form aforesaid. And they say that the lord John sometime King &c. by his charter in the sixth year of his reign, granted to his burgesses of Cambridge a gild merchant, and that none of them should plead beyond the walls of the borough of Cambridge concerning any plea, save pleas of external tenures, except his moneyers and servants, and that they should have their lands and tenures and pledges and all debts, no matter who should owe the same, and that touching their lands and tenures which are within the borough, right should be holden to them according to the custom of the borough, and concerning all other their debts, which were lent at Cambridge, and concerning pledges there made, pleas should be holden at Cambridge. And further they say that the said John sometime King &c., by another charter of his, in the eighth year of his reign, granted and by his said charter confirmed to his burgesses of Cambridge the town of Cambridge with all its appurtenances, to have and to hold for ever, of him the then King and his heirs, to them and their heirs, rendering therefor yearly to his exchequer the ancient farm, namely forty pounds blanch and twenty pounds by tale by way of increase, for all service by their hands at the two exchequers of the year; and that they and their heirs should have and hold the aforesaid town with all its appurtenances, well and peaceably, freely and quietly, wholly and fully and honourably, in meadows and pastures, mills, water and pools, with all their liberties and free customs; and that they should make from among themselves a reeve whom they would and when they would. And they say that, after the aforesaid grant, the burgesses of the aforesaid town in every year chose their reeve and bailiffs of the aforesaid town on the morrow of the Nativity of the Blessed Mary; and the said reeve and bailiffs always held before them at Cambridge all the aforesaid pleas, bailiff of the King himself should meddle with any matters relating to their liberties, except upon default of the aforesaid burgesses or of their bailiffs of the same town; and that the said burgesses might be able to choose from among themselves and create coroners in the aforesaid town, to make attachment of the pleas of his crown arising within the aforesaid town of Cambridge, until the coming of his Justices, as pertained to his coroners elsewhere; and the same King forbad under a penalty of ten pounds that any one should presume to vex, molest or disturb them against such liberties and grants. And they [the burgesses] produce here in court the aforesaid charter testifying the premisses, and dated at Westminster on the eleventh day of April in the fortieth year of his reign. And [they say that] afterwards the lord Edward sometime King of England, the great-grandfather of the now lord King, inspecting the aforesaid charters and confirmations of his ancestors, and ratifying and according the said gifts, grants and confirmations, did for himself and his heirs, as far as in him lay, grant and confirm the same to the aforesaid burgesses, their heirs and successors, as the aforesaid charters reasonably testify; and moreover, the said King, wishing to confer an ampler favour on the said burgesses, granted to them aforesaid for himself and his heirs, that, although they theretofore had not fully used all or some of the liberties and quittances aforesaid, nevertheless they, their heirs and successors aforesaid might reasonably enjoy and use the liberties and quittances aforesaid and any of these henceforth, without let or hindrance by the King or his heirs or any his ministers, and that concerning trespasses or contracts made in the said borough and its suburbs, they should not plead nor be impleaded outside that borough unless the matter should concern the King or his heirs; and that concerning such trespasses and contracts or other internal affairs they should in no wise be convicted by foreigners, but only by their fellow-burgesses, unless the matter should concern the King or his heirs or the commonalty of the borough aforesaid. And [they say that] afterwards the lord now King, inspecting the said charters of

Et proferunt hic in curia cartam domini Regis nunc premissa testificantem, cuius data est apud Westmonasterium octavo die Decembris anno regni sui primo. Et dicunt quod maior et ballivi burgi predicti, qui pro tempore fuerunt, semper a tempore confeccionis predictae carte predicti Edwardi proavi &c., habuerunt cognitionem omnium placitorum in burgo predicto emergencium, tenendorum in burgo predicto in forma predicta. Et dicunt quod huiusmodi libertas maiori et ballivis ville predictae coram domino Rege nunc extitit allocata videlicet termino Sancti Hillarii anno regni domini Regis nunc secundo, Rotulo lvij., inter Iohannem Scothowe querentem et Adam Savage de Cantebriggia de placito transgressionis; et similiter termino Sancti Hillarii anno regni domini Regis nunc tercio Rotulo xlix., inter Thomam Redere de Cantebriggia querentem et Willelmum Baylif et Rogerum Harleston de capcione et detencione catallorum &c.; et similiter termino Sancti Michaelis anno regni domini Edwardi nuper Regis Anglie, avi domini Regis nunc, tricesimo septimo, Rotulo lxxxvij., inter Willelmum Shyrwynke querentem et Iohannem filium Stephani Morice de placito transgressionis; et eciam termino Sancti Hillarii anno eiusdem avi &c. xxxij., Rotulo Cij., inter Iohannem With querentem et Iohannem Freng de placito transgressionis &c. Quia maior, ballivi et burgenses ville nostre Cante-

his ancestors, and ratifying and according the gifts, grants, confirmations, liberties and quittances contained in the aforesaid charters, did for himself and his heirs, so far as in him lay, accept, approve and ratify the same, and by his charter did grant and confirm the same to the said burgesses, their heirs and successors, in such wise as the charter aforesaid of the aforesaid Edward his great-grandfather reasonably testifies, and in such wise as the said burgesses always, from the time of the granting and making of the aforesaid charter, have been wont reasonably to use and enjoy the liberties and quittances aforesaid. And they produce here in court the charter of the lord now King, testifying the premisses, of which the date is at Westminster on the eighth day of December in the first year of his reign. And they say that the mayor and bailiffs of the borough aforesaid, for the time being, have always from the time of the making of the aforesaid charter of the aforesaid Edward the great-grandfather &c., had cognizance of all pleas arising in the borough aforesaid, to be held in the borough aforesaid in form aforesaid. And they say that such liberty is allowed to the mayor and bailiffs of the town aforesaid before the lord now King, to wit, in the Hilary term in the second year of the reign of the lord now King on Roll No. 58 [in a suit] between John Scothowe plaintiff and Adam Savage of Cambridge in a plea of trespass; and likewise in the Hilary term of the third year of the reign of the lord now King on Roll No. 49 [in a suit] between Thomas Redere of Cambridge plaintiff and William Bayliff and Roger Harleston touching a taking and detention of chattels &c.; and likewise in the Michaelmas term in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of the lord Edward, sometime King of England, the grandfather of the lord now King, on Roll No. 97 [in a suit] between William Shyrwynke plaintiff and John the son of Stephen Morice in a plea of trespass; and also in the Hilary term in the 33rd year of the same grandfather &c., on Roll No. 103 [in a suit] between John With plaintiff and John Freng concerning a plea of trespass &c. Whereas the mayor, bailiffs and burgesses of our town of Cambridge, as well by the charters of our ancestors sometime Kings of England, which we have confirmed, as by our charter, claim to have divers privileges, quittances, immunities, free customs, gifts, grants, fairs and other liberties, which they and their predecessors, mayors, bailiffs and burgesses of the town aforesaid from the time of the making of the charters and of the confirmation aforesaid always hitherto have used and enjoyed, so they say: We command you that, having seen the aforesaid charters, you do allow them, the said mayor, bailiffs and burgesses to use and enjoy before you all and singular the privileges, quittances, immunities, free customs, gifts, grants, fairs and liberties contained in them, according to the tenour of the charters and of the confirmation aforesaid, in such wise as they ought to use the same and as they and all their predecessors, mayors, bailiffs and burgesses of the same town, have always heretofore been wont reasonably to use and enjoy those privileges, quittances, immunities, free customs, gifts, grants, fairs and liberties from the time aforesaid: Save always and except the liberties and privileges granted to the chancellor and scholars of the university of Cambridge and their successors by the charters of our ancestors or by our own, or by the letters patent of the same our ancestors, or by our own: Witness myself at Westminster on the twenty-fifth day of July in the seventh year of our reign. Wherefore the said mayor and bailiffs once more seek cognizance of this plea in form aforesaid &c. And the said charters having been seen, and also the allowances aforesaid remaining with our lord the King, because it manifestly appears to the court that such liberty was heretofore allowed in a similar case: Therefore they shall have their liberty therein &c. aforesaid before the aforesaid mayor and bailiffs in the gildhall at Cambridge on the Tuesday the feast of the Translation of Saint Thomas the Martyr, and the aforesaid attorney is ordered to shew full and speedy justice to the parties aforesaid: otherwise let them return &c. We have inspected also the tenour of the record and process of the suit which was held before the Steward and Marshal of our Household at Cambridge on the Tuesday next after the feast of the Translation of Saint Thomas the Martyr last past, [in a plea] between Thomas Lodeworth and Geoffrey Castur of Cambridge concerning thirty-eight shillings, which the said Thomas exacts from the aforesaid Geoffrey, and also the allowances of liberties to the mayor and bailiffs of the town aforesaid according to the liberties and customs granted to them by the charters of our ancestors sometime Kings of England, which we have confirmed in these words: We have inspected the tenour of the record and process of the suit which was held before us in these words:—Pleas of the Hall of the lord King's household being at Cambridge on Wednesday next after the feast of the Translation of Saint Thomas the Martyr before the Steward and Marshal of the said Household and in the seventh year of the reign of King Richard the Second after the conquest. Geoffrey Castur of Cambridge was attached by bill to answer Thomas Lodeworth concerning a plea of debt; and hereupon the said Thomas in his own person complains of the aforesaid Geoffrey and says that he owes to him and unjustly detains thirty-eight shillings, because the said Geoffrey there bought in the quindene of St Michael, in the sixth year of the reign of King Richard the Second, a hide from the aforesaid Thomas for the sum aforesaid to be paid whensoever &c.: and the said Thomas sought the aforesaid sum of money to be paid to him, and although the said Geoffrey was frequently called upon for payment of the said thirty-eight shillings by the aforesaid Thomas, he altogether refuses the said sum in payment and so unjustly detains it, whereby he is injured and has damage to the value of forty shillings, and thereof he produces suit:

Per quod iidem maior et ballivi ut prius petunt cognitionem istius placiti in forma predicta &c.: Et visis cartis predictis, ante tempus memorie quam post, et diligenter examinatis, necnon allocacionibus predictis coram domino Rege residentibus, quia manifeste constat curie quod huiusmodi libertas eis alias extit<sup>1</sup> allocata in casu consimili, licet tamen expresse non exprimantur, coram Senescallo et Marescallo, per verba specialia in cartis ante tempus memorie, habito tamen respectu ad cartas predictas et ad alias cartas ex post facto factas, necnon ad allocaciones placitorum coram eis adjudicatas et cartas et confirmaciones Regis nunc et ad alias causas, letas, curias, motas: Ideo habeant inde libertatem suam &c.: Et super hoc predictus attornatus prefixit diem partibus predictis coram maiore et ballivis in gilda aula apud Cantebrigiam die veneris proxima post festum translacionis Sancti Thome martiris, et dictum est prefato attornato quod partibus predictis plena et celeris justicia exhibeatur: alioquin reddeant &c.: Nos autem tenores recordorum et processuum ac allocacionis predictorum ad requisicionem maioris et burgensium ville Cantebrigie duximus exemplificandas per presentes: In cuius rei testimonium has litteras nostras fieri fecimus patentes. And the aforesaid Geoffrey being present in court &c.: On which comes Robert Jugler the attorney of the mayor and bailiffs of the town of Cambridge to seek and claim their liberties, and he challenges their liberty therein, namely to have cognizance of the aforesaid plea before the aforesaid mayor and bailiffs in their gildhall at Cambridge.

Here follows a copy of the recital of the history of the borough, hereinbefore translated p. 81 (for they say that the town of Cambridge is an ancient borough, &c.) to the foot of p. 89 (John Freng concerning a plea of trespass).

Wherefore the said mayor and bailiffs once more seek cognizance of that plea in form aforesaid &c.: And the charters aforesaid, before the time of memory and after, being seen and diligently examined, and also the allowances aforesaid remaining with the lord King, because it manifestly appears to the court that such liberty was heretofore allowed to them in a similar case, (although nevertheless [such liberties] are not expressly stated,) before the Steward and Marshal, by special words in charters before the time of memory, respect nevertheless being had to the charters aforesaid and to other charters made subsequently, as also to the allowances of pleas adjudged before them and the charters and confirmations of the now King, and to other causes, leets, moots, courts: Therefore let them have their liberty herein &c.: and thereupon the aforesaid attorney [of the borough] fixed a day for the parties aforesaid before the mayor and bailiffs in the gildhall at Cambridge on the Friday next after the Translation of Saint Thomas the martyr, and the aforesaid attorney is ordered to shew full and speedy justice to the parties aforesaid: otherwise let them return &c.: Now we have thought good that the tenour of the records and processes and allowance aforesaid at the request of the mayor and burgesses of the town of Cambridge be exemplified by these presents: In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness myself at Westminster on the thirteenth day of May in the second year of our reign.

XXVII. LETTERS PATENT OF CHARLES THE FIRST.

<sup>1</sup>Charles by the grace of God of England, Scotland, France and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith, &c. to all to whom these presents shall come, greeting. Whereas our borough of Cambridge in our county of Cambridge is an ancient and populous borough, and whereas the mayor, bailiffs and burgesses of the said borough have had and have used and enjoyed divers liberties, franchises, customs, immunities and preeminences, as well by reason and pretext of divers charters and letters patent heretofore made, granted or confirmed by divers our ancestors and predecessors sometime Kings or Queens of England as by reason and pretext of divers prescriptions, uses and customs in the said borough from old time used and accustomed: And whereas our beloved subjects the now mayor, bailiffs and burgesses of the said borough have most humbly supplicated us that we, for the better ruling, government and amelioration of the said borough, would be willing graciously to extend and shew our royal grace and munificence in this respect, and that we would be willing to make, ordain, constitute, erect and create the aforesaid mayor, bailiffs and burgesses of the said borough by whatever name or by whatever names they may now be

I. LETTERS EXEMPLIFICATORY OF KING EDWARD THE THIRD.

<sup>1</sup>Edward by the grace of God King of England, Lord of Ireland and of Aquitaine, to all to whom the present letters shall come greeting. We have inspected the plea and the process held before the Barons of our Exchequer in these words:—Pleas before the Barons of the Exchequer in the octave of Saint Martin in the fortieth year of the reign of King Edward the Third since the conquest. The Prior of Caldwell comes before the Barons on the 18th day of November in this term by John of Rotherham his attorney and complains by a bill concerning Edmund Litster<sup>2</sup> bailiff of the town of Cambridge now present on his account of the debts of the lord King leviabie within the liberty of the said town, rendered in this manner within the octave of Saint Martin for the men of the said town, inasmuch as that whereas the mayor and bailiffs of the said town of Cambridge for the time being render to the said Prior yearly 12 marks and 10 shillings on account of the third penny of the farm of the said town, which 12 marks and 10 shillings the lord John formerly King of England, ancestor of our present lord the King, assigned to Earl David and although the said bailiff has levied the whole farm of the said town and the said Prior has often called upon the said bailiff to pay him that rent, nevertheless the said bailiff under colour of his office keeps the aforesaid rent for the two years last past, namely for each year 12 marks and 10 shillings in his own hands, and would not pay anything thereof to the said prior but has refused the payment of that rent and still refuses, whereby he is defrauded and suffers damage to the value of 40 pounds: And this he offers &c.: And the aforesaid bailiff being present &c.: And being called upon by the Barons concerning the premises he defends the damage and whatever &c.: And he asks for a day for pleading thereon, until the morrow and has the said day:

And the aforesaid prior likewise : On which day the aforesaid prior comes by his said attorney : And John of London the mayor of the said town of Cambridge and the aforesaid bailiff come likewise in their own persons : And they fully acknowledge that the mayor and bailiffs of the aforesaid town of Cambridge for the time being should render yearly to the aforesaid prior 12 marks and 10 shillings, as the aforesaid prior by his aforesaid bill alleges, and that the said payment is in arrears to the said prior for the two years last past : And the aforesaid prior asks for judgment on the acknowledgment &c. : Therefore it is considered that the aforesaid prior shall recover the aforesaid payment from the aforesaid bailiff, namely 17 pounds for the two years aforesaid and his damages assessed by the Barons at 40 shillings : And the said bailiff for unjust detainue in mercy &c. : And the aforesaid prior remits the damages &c. and granted to the aforesaid bailiff a day for payment to him of the aforesaid money on the feast of the conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary next ensuing which day of payment the said bailiff agreed to &c. : We therefore at the request of the aforesaid prior have caused the tenour of the aforesaid plea and process to be exemplified under the seal of our Exchequer. In witness whereof we have caused these our letters to be made patent. Witness T. de Bodelowe at Westminster the 20th day of November in the thirty-ninth year of our reign.
